Savanna Barlow is committed to providing practical solutions to improve the reliability of the energy system through the development of renewable and alternative energy. As an associate in the Energy group, Savanna advises clients on a broad range of real estate, transactional and litigation matters specific to the energy sector. Savanna represents developers of clean energy projects, including wind, solar, battery storage and transmission infrastructure.

In addition to development, Savanna is an experienced litigator who has counseled clients across all stages of the litigation process in state and federal courts. Her substantial litigation experience allows her to develop strategic approaches to complex legal issues within the energy industry.

Prior to joining Polsinelli, Savanna served as an international tax intern at a Big Four accounting firm. During law school, she served on the editorial board of the Baylor Law Review as the Senior Technical Editor and competed on multiple national moot court and mock trial teams.
